From the Editor

Having computer problems again. I have an E-Machine which is slowly dieing. My problem now is with links. Some of this issue has clickable links while others do not. That is because my computer will not let me make the links clickable from here on out. You will need to copy and paste the unclickable links into your browser to read. Sorry about the inconvenience...It sure is one for me. We are in the last few months of the 150 sesquicentennial, I just hope my computer makes it to the end.

This Week in The Civil War for Sunday, Jan. 11: Union closes last Atlantic seaport for Confederacy, storming Fort Fisher in North Carolina.

A heavy Union bombardment and second assault within weeks led to the federal capture of Fort Fisher in North Carolina. For Southerners who only recently rejoiced over an early Confederate success in turning back a Union attack on the fort in December 1864, it was demoralizing news. The fall of the fort effectively shut off the last Confederate seaport on the Atlantic coast. In the attack this month 150 years ago in the war, nearly 60 Union vessels rained hundreds of shells down on the stout parapets. Within two days, the Confederate garrison in the fort was overrun and had surrendered. Union troops would then march inland to ensure Wilmington was shut off from the coast, enduring heavy casualties en route.
