Aren't we lucky we don't take the Scriptures literally? If we did it would appear from today's Gospel that only multilingual, snake-wrangling, poison-drinking exorcists, with a gift for healing, would be seen as the genuine Christian article. That would leave most of us out in the cold.

This passage, however, is a dramatic addition to Mark's Gospel to show that even though Jesus is now at the right hand of God, he sends his disciples out to the whole world to carry on his ministry, and that he will protect us when trials come. And even though there have been tragic and shocking chapters in our 2,000 year history, it's good for us to remember what God has done in and through us as we have gone out and proclaimed the saving love of Christ. Today 33% of the world's population are, at least nominally, Christian, numbering 2.1 billion people, making us the largest religion in the world. Our Catholic family accounts for just over half this group. We have around 1.1 billion Catholic brothers and sisters worldwide. Many Christians continue to be persecuted or discriminated for their faith, and some continue to die for their love of Christ which impels them to seek justice for all.

But the feast of the Ascension is not just an opportunity for us to look back on how we have tried to fulfil the command of the Lord to go out to the world. Indeed, this feast is primarily focused on where we are going from here on in. The Ascension promises us that just as the Father raised Jesus from the dead, so too the Father, Son and Spirit will welcome us into heaven as well, to be at Christ's right hand for eternity. This parable demonstrates the point. In 1939 a father and son were famous art collectors. When World War II broke out, the son volunteered. In 1944 the son died in battle while rescuing another soldier. A year later, a young man came to see the father. 'Sir, you don't know me but I was with your son when he died. I want you to know he didn't suffer.'

'I know you both loved art, and though this isn't much, I want you to have it.' He gave the father a package. Inside was a portrait of the son. It was rough work, but the father welled up with tears. 'It was the least I could do for your son because he saved my life.'

A few months later, the father died. At the art auction which followed, investors gathered from around the world. The first item up for bid was the portrait of the son. The auctioneer tried to start the bidding, '$200 ... $100 ... Any bids? Any at all?' The investors called out, 'Skip this one. Where are the Rembrandts?' Just then a man spoke up from the back. 'I'll give you ten dollars for the painting. It's all the money I have.' It was the gardener at the father's estate. So the auctioneer brought down his gavel. 'Sold for ten dollars!' An investor called back, 'Can we now get on with it?'

But the auctioneer continued, 'The auction is over. According to the will, whoever bought this painting would inherit the estate, including all the art.'

No matter what they said the wealthy investors couldn't buy their way into the inheritance. Only the one who had the eyes of love, and knew what he was looking at, inherited everything the Father and Son had to offer.

May we go out from this Feast of the Ascension so confident of our spiritual inheritance to come, that we lavish its riches on all we meet right now. Because when it comes to Christ's kingdom, there's plenty for everyone. © Richard Leonard SJ.

The Titanic's Forgotten Priest

Ian Hunter

One week after Easter, to be precise on April 14, 2012, in ways solemn and sometimes frankly macabre, the world observed the centenary of a tragic event in maritime history, the sinking of the RMS Titanic. Cruise ships retraced the Titanic's first (and last) voyage from Southampton in England to a watery grave off the Grand Banks; revelers in period costumes dined on a menu based on the last dinner aboard the White Star Line ship; memorial services were conducted on land and sea to commemorate the 1,500 souls who perished on that night.

The CBC even dispatched a landlubber, Peter Mansbridge, and the whole crew of The National, to stand before a Halifax backdrop (Halifax had played a crucial role in the rescue efforts and in the recovery of bodies) to deliver the nightly news (including, ironically, cuts to the CBC's Halifax bureau). And almost forgotten in all this hoopla was one obscure Catholic priest and his heroism.

The priest's name was Thomas Byles, a 42-year-old convert to the Catholic Church, sailing second class to New York in order to conduct the wedding for his brother, William. News reports at the time said that Byles was wearing his priestly vestments and had been reciting his breviary on the upper deck at the moment when the Titanic struck the iceberg.

According to witnesses, as the ship went down, the priest helped women and children into lifeboats, heard confessions, gave absolution and led passengers in reciting the Rosary.

Born in England in 1870, Byles was the son of a Congregational minister; he studied mathematics and theology at Oxford University where he fell under the influence of the "Oxford Movement," part of the legacy of one of the greatest of all Catholic converts, Cardinal John Henry Newman. Byles graduated from Oxford in 1894 and the same year became a Roman Catholic. In 1899 he went to Rome for further study; he was ordained a priest in 1902.

Father Byles set out on his fateful journey on April 10, 1912, travelling by train from his parish (St. Helen's in Ongar, Essex) to Liverpool Street station, thence to Waterloo Station, then by boat train to the pier at Southampton where the unsinkable (or so it was boasted) ship awaited him. He carried his second class trans-Atlantic ticket (#244310). The cost of the ticket – £13.

Miss Mary Helen Mocklare was a third-class passenger who survived; she later wrote:

"One sailor ... warned the priest of his danger and begged him to board a boat. Father Byles refused. The same seaman spoke to him again and he seemed anxious to help him, but he refused again. Father Byles could have been saved, but he would not leave while one was left and the sailor's entreaties were not heeded. After I got in the boat, which was the last one to leave, and we were slowly going further away from the ship, I could hear distinctly the voice of the priest and the responses to his prayers."

Another passenger, Agnes McCoy, travelling second class, had similar recollections; she wrote:

"I first saw Father Byles in the steerage. There were many Catholics there, and he eased their minds by praying for them, hearing confessions and giving them his blessing. I later saw him on the upper deck reading from his priest's book of hours. Survivors, especially a young English lad, told me later that he pocketed the book, gathered the men about him and, while they knelt, offered up prayer for their salvation."

We have lived into a time when Catholic priests are almost universally ridiculed, caricatured and belittled. The next time I hear such talk I shall call to my mind the image of Father Thomas Byles kneeling on the sloping deck of the Titanic.

Father Byles went down with the ship. His body was never recovered.

P.S. According to The Tablet (21st April), there were three priests on board, all of whom went down with the ship. Fr Joseph Peruschitz, of Scheyern Abbey in Germany, and Fr Juozas Montvila from Latvia, were also seen kneeling on the deck and saying the Rosary with 100 fellow passengers, as the last lifeboat pulled away. JH

St John the Baptist Church Artwork

(Jan Aspinall)

Within the Glass and Timber artwork, in this contemporary Church, are layers of meaning, which grow independent of us here today.

The artwork is neither literal nor pictorial. Instead, you the viewer are asked to experience both the mood and atmosphere which is created by the work.

Your journey begins at the entry doors, were a ripple is depicted.

The ripple motif came to me while I was researching and creating the concept designs. I had an intimate and special moment, were a vision of a single drop of water falling from the hand of John the Baptist to the head of Jesus and then to the water below, creating a ripple. That first ripple, that spread Christianity throughout the community, then, now and always.

The ripple motif progresses around the walls, until it is united and linked with a weave. The weave depicts and connects the fabric of the community within as well as the community outside the church.

Weaving and connecting us to those who came before, those in the church community today and those who will follow, 'the communion of saints'.

Once inside the Church, I wanted to bring you a feeling of drama, of warmth, and yet a feeling of intimacy, one of closeness (not an easy task in a Church of this size) I also wanted the viewer to feel as though they were being embraced.

The corpus which is suspended above the altar presents Jesus in a profound and dynamic way. The corpus is also a visual link to the old original site for the church, across the road from this new and dramatic space.

I truly believe this is a Church to be profoundly impressed by, it has national significance as well as an international profile to be proud of.
